

Grin And Bear It

I Just Want To Play

is about giving permission to play. It makes the point that in a world where grownups have forgotten how to play - it is okay and necessary to allow yourself to play.

Will It Get Me Laid?

is about the competition for a mate. It makes the point that people gather the trappings of success to make themselves more viable as a mate. Maybe it would be better to just be genuine.

Because I'm Pretty Sure I'm Right

is about the ridiculousness of having to be right all the time. It makes the point that entrenching yourself in a position is polarizing and divisive. Maybe it would be better to listen to the other side.

Sometimes I Forget That I Am Dying

is about confronting your own mortality. It makes the point that it is wise to remember we are only here for a moment and that there will be others after us.

Greater Than You

is about the need that some people have to be superior to others. It makes the point that it is better to be inclusive and welcoming, rather than elitist and exclusionary.

Meat Makes Me Happy

is about the political nature of our food supply. It makes the point that people are polarized by this very personal issue. Perhaps it is better to not force a point of view down other people's throats.

I'm Just Here For The Snacks

is about the fact that sometimes we just all show up for the free food. It makes the point that everyone does things to get things, but maybe it would be better to be more genuine.

I Just Want Tenure

is about the insecure time that academics experience pre-tenure. It makes the point that this challenge can bring out the best or the worst in a person, depending on his or her disposition.

It's Still A Boys Club

is about the unbalanced relationship between sexes and the disparity of opportunities determined by gender. It makes the point that the fight for equality is not over.

I Just Want To Talk About Me

is about narcissism. It makes the point that self-interest can block out all other voices. Perhaps it is better to listen to each other and not be so self-concerned.
